The wife describes the furnishings as “a little more fashion forward” than the décor in she and her husband’s previous homes. “I was really into antiques and traditional period furniture,” she says. “But, a few years ago, I decided I wanted things to be lighter, and more comfortable and colorful.”

“We sought to create a very important entrance foyer and a layering of textures and pieces throughout the home,” says Montoya, noting a series of custom maple veneer panels in the formal living room. It serves as a backdrop to the glass-and-metal game table he commissioned from Tucker Robbins, and its circa 1940 leather-and-ebonized mahogany chairs. “The space also houses a bar that’s hidden away and can be opened for entertaining.”
